of Warren's movement, and as to what Grant intended to accomplish by it. It will be said that Warren has done all that Grant intended and that the movement was a complete success. But your readers are now in possession of the facts which prove that this is not so Gen. Grant hoped beside, and believed that this formidable movement of Warren's would cause General Lee to detach from the imcause General Lee to detach from the immediate defenses of Petersburg so large a portion of his force that our army could attack those defences successfully. The event has only afforded another demonstration of the superiority of General Lee over General Grant as a strategist. General Lee did detach a force large snough to baffie Warren, and to save Weldon, and to prevent Warren from advancing any further south or west than a point near Jarrett's. But that did not weaken his lines at Petersburg and Richmond attack has not and will not be made. denial of the above facts are useless, the blame for the failure will be thrown upon the weather; but I think I have fastened it where it belongs.
